Members of the European Environment and Health Task Force;

Dear colleagues,

The WHO European Centre for Environment and Health (ECEH) in Bonn, Germany is seeking examples of interventions to protect and promote mental health in the face of climate change in the WHO European Region. With this call, ECEH aims to map existing interventions related to different mental health outcomes (e.g., eco-anxiety, functional disorders), different manifestations of climate change (e.g., heat waves, loss of livelihood), undertaken at various levels (e.g., national, local), targeting different population groups (e.g., youth, frontline workers), and providing different levels of mental health and psychosocial support (MHPSS) (e.g., mental health care, awareness building, community strengthening).

The mapping of case studies will help to document activities already underway in the WHO European Region, to identify current gaps, and to promote further action. This information will feed into a planned WHO policy brief on mental health and climate change.

In addition, selected case studies may be featured as good practice examples on the WHO website, the European Climate and Health Observatory website, or during WHO led events. We will liaise with contributors of selected submissions to further elaborate on these interventions.

More information on the type of case studies in focus, the submission process, and background information to this call can be found in the PDF file (English and Russian) attached to this email.

The deadline for submission is January 15, 2025.

You are invited to submit information through the following links:
