The competition consists of three halves of 15 minutes each. A 10-minute break is provided between the halves. After each break, the teams change tai kazans.

The weight of the goat carcass is 30-32 kg, and if the playing field is dirty, then weight is 26-28 kg. If the competition is held using a dummy, the weight will be 30 kg.

Competitions are held in the format of a tournament of national teams. Each team must have 2 sets of uniform uniforms in different colors (with protective elements), consisting of a headdress (tebetay), a sweater (T-shirt), boots, a whip with an indication of belonging to a particular country. The uniforms of the national teams in the colors of the national flags are welcome. The players must have a number on their backs, which must match the actual number in the application.

The day before the start of the games, the judging panel for the sport, together with representatives of the teams, hold a technical meeting, at which a draw is held and, depending on the number of applications submitted, the competition procedure is determined: the number of groups, playoff games and final games. The two teams that occupy the highest positions in the kok boru world ranking are divided into different groups.

Before the start of each game, representatives of the teams may be present during the weighing of the goat carcass.

Determining the winners and scoring points:

- the team that wins in regular time is awarded 3 points.;
- the team that lost in regular time, 0 points;
- the teams that came out with a draw in the regular time (group games) spend additional time to identify the winner. The golden carcass rule applies in extra time. In case of a tie in extra time, the teams play a shootout: the winners (in extra time or according to the results of shootouts) are awarded 2 points, the losing team – 1 point.

The teams that played in the semifinal and final games with a draw in regular time are also given extra time. The golden carcass rule applies during extra time. If the teams draw in extra time, shootouts are played.

list may be replaced during the match, but players and horses not listed in the list are not allowed.

The game consists of two halves of 20 minutes each. There is a 10-minute break between the halves. After the break, the teams change their finishing lines (game directions). During the competition, no more than two people should be near the team: 1 coach, 1 representative.

The victory goes to the team that was able to throw more serke (dummy) into its circle (finish). The weight of the dummy should not exceed 30-33 kg.

If the score remains equal at the end of the regular time of the match, a break of 5 minutes is provided. After that, the teams change finish lines again and an additional time of 10 minutes is assigned. During this time, the team that brought the salym (carcass) into the circle first is declared the winner. If none of the teams succeeds in making a salym during extra time, the winner is determined using the "zhokpe-zhek" method (duels). To do this, one rider from each team enters the central circle. The judge throws the carcass ("serke") between them. The rider who manages to snatch the carcass and bring it into his circle gets one point. Each match takes 3 minutes. If none of the players has scored a point in the allotted time, the referee stops the match and calls the next pair. If during the match the carcass ("serke") goes out of bounds (out), the match is immediately stopped and the next one begins. In this format, three riders from each team participate, and three duels are held. The team with the most points after three matches is declared the winner.
